DESIGN

Broadsoft's mission to "remove borders, barriers, walls, and silos" became words of inspiration for the DCS team in the design of the firm's Tysons office. The global communications and technology company wanted a new space which encourages staff fluidity, creativity, and communication. The resulting innovative office design is now being implemented around the country, and has become the corporate prototype for the future.

The most interesting and innovative design features are the large centralized, glass enclosed, communication rotundas which include spaces for large meetings, smaller meetings, collaboration, and private phone calls. The rotundas also feature centralized egress corridors lined with lockers for the staff, creating an informal connectivity area. These rotundas allow for fluid and flexible use and can easily be reconfigured as needed. The rotundas are located adjacent to workstations, encouraging the "cross pollenation" of ideas between teams as a centralized hub of activity. The entire space is accented with the Broadsoft corporate colors to promote the brand to visiting clients. To accommodate future growth and flexibility, meeting rooms are standardized allowing for conversion to offices or other needed spaces. A coffee and balcony lounge is positioned on the south side of the space while the lunch-room and the game-room are located on the north side to encourage movement and staff connection throughout the space.
